| Graz University, Government of Austria, 2008 | Practice of Minority Protection in Central Europe. Survey of the best practices of minority protection in Central Europe. The aim of the project has been to identify best practices of minority protection, while at the same time studying under which conditions such practices can function and under which circumstances the application of certain measures is not recommendable. This goal was reached by comparatively studying the real situation of autochthonous minorities in certain key areas, taking into consideration the respective social, cultural, historical, political and economic context. The situation in Austria, Italy, Slovenia, Hungary, Slovakia and Romania has been studied. Main focus has been placed on the impact that the implementation of provisions for the protection of minorities have had on the interethnic living together, the mutual trust, the functioning of institutions and the interstate relations. This is shedding light on which impact an adequate minority protection system can have on the internal and external stability, economic prosperity and the lived cultural diversity within a state. Project thus helps to enhance and improve social inclusion and streamlining of social policies in countries of Central Europe. |

The aim of the study has been to find out what is the perspective of Czech employers upon employing Roma, whether there is a capacity for employment of Roma in the enterprises in the Czech Republic in general, what are the barriers and are the specific experiences with Roma employees. The conclusions of the Analysis show, that Roma people work predominantly in low (or no) education level jobs and mainly in manual positions. Since the main problem at the moment is the very high unemployment of Roma the research team concentrated mainly on mapping the opinions and experiences of employers offering manual jobs rather than on higher status jobs. |
| Institute for the Study of Labor (IZA) Bonn; EC, 2007 | Study on the social and labor market integration of ethnic minorities. Project has been dealing with issues of discrimination, segregation, and marginalization of ethnic minorities that are in stark conflict with the cornerstone values of the EU as embedded in acquis communautaire. Yet, social and economic disintegration remains an everyday challenge to millions of members of ethnic minorities living in the EU today. Ethnic integration challenges appear in a variety of forms, from unequal access to health care and social services to unemployment, underemployment, and substandard remuneration of individuals belonging to different ethnic minorities. Labor market segmentation is a particularly worrisome issue, since equal labor market opportunities are a cornerstone for achieving the key objectives of the European Employment Strategy, as defined by full employment, increased productivity and enhanced quality of work, and strengthened social cohesion and inclusion. Therefore, it is imperative for the European society to strengthen labor market integration of ethnic minorities. To this end, a large number of legislative acts, policies, and local actions have been implemented to date. |
